PERSONAL AND SOCIETY.

Stout women complain that fashions are all created for their sisters of slender form, and a glance through the papers and magazines devoted to fashion show that there is ground for this complaint. No one ever sees a fat woman used as a subject for showing off the latest fancy in frills or furbelows. The shoulder cape was not made for a short, dumpy figure; nor were the little toques nor Rembrandt shapes presented to view for the first time surmounting the head of a woman with no neck to speak of. Yet women of all sizes and builds are compelled to array themselves in a garb of some sort, and the overwhelming majority prefer the latest mode, from bonnet to shoes. The very last bit of paraphernalia, over which the feminine mind lingers, hesitates and finally succumbs and purchases, is the feather boa. This bit of finery was manufactured expressly for a woman whose long, thin neck and slender, sloping shoulders were a constant annoyance to her. The soft, loose feathers filled the hollow space at the nape of the neck, rounded the outline of sharp shoulders and covered and relieved the angles from bonnet to belt, and the awkward pole upon which her head was set was conspicuous no more. When my thin lady appeared in public, no longer an awkward, angular figure, but one of rounded outline, she looked so much improved that everyone who saw her felt how vastly becoming such a graceful garland of coftness was. Forthwith the first manufacturer found his business increasing. Othersenvied his success and began to make an inferior article. Then Mr. Economy thought that there were a great many women who would like a bit of feather about them, but had no $10 or $100 to buy the luxury, so he cut the ends off and made just a length for the neck. The more he cut off the more he wrecked the grace and beauty of the feather boa, but it hindered not the sale thereof. To-day the craze is the boa, and the fat, dumpy woman is sure to have one. She was round in the first place, but now with a wreath of plume de coque, she is a lesson in well-rounded curves, with merely a slight indentation to show where one ends and another begins. She buries her head in the garniture, and she is at once incog. No one can possibly know their best friend from any side, unless perchance it should be face to face. The two-and-a-half or three-yard length feather bos on a graceful, slender woman accentuates her grace, on a stout woman it spoils both.
